"The Baltimore Police Department does not have a gun database, as defined by the U.S. Justice Department, to track the numbers of people killed or even to understand the extent to which police misconduct leads to the killings of people like the Rev. Al Sharpton," the New York Times reported. "What the state is trying to do is document homicides that don't have police involvement or a single witness.".. The killings at the hands of police, which have been widely publicized by the press, is still "still too much information for many investigators," according to "The Hidden Truth Of The Baltimore Police Department.. Rubin, who recently wrote the critically-acclaimed and widely reviled book Police Killers: Black and White or The Unseen Mass Murder in America, also details two other killings reported over the past decade that may prove to be similarly rare — one with a gun, in which three people were killed, and in which four people, apparently were also killed by police, for no apparent crime other than the fact that one of them had a gun and the other two did not.. It's impossible to be very precise about the gun that killed the Rev. Sharpton — and it's also impossible to be absolutely sure with any certainty how likely the police killing of Sharpton was..
